Objection Handling Library

V1.0 · THE 12 MOST COMMON PUSHBACKS AND HOW TO NAVIGATE THEM

The general framework

Every objection follows the same arc: acknowledge → reframe → ask. We never argue. We never overcome. We help them think out loud.

If you find yourself "fighting" an objection, you've already lost. Drop the script, listen, and either make a real recommendation that fits their situation — or mark Lost with a clean reason and move on. The dialer has thousands of leads. Your time is the scarce resource.

1. "We already have a website."

Reframe: not all websites are equal. Most small-business sites built before 2020 fail mobile speed checks and don't install as apps.

"That's awesome — most of the businesses I talk to do. The reason I called is half of those sites don't pass Google's mobile speed test anymore, which quietly tanks their search ranking. Mind if I take 60 seconds to look up yours and tell you where you stand? No commitment."

2. "We already pay [Wix / Squarespace / GoDaddy / Yelp Pages]."

Reframe: those are templates, not platforms. They don't install on phones, don't push notifications, don't own the customer data.

"Totally fair — those are great for getting up fast. The thing they don't do is turn into an app on your customer's phone. That's the piece we add: when somebody loads your site once, it offers to install. After that you can ping them with a push notification when there's a special, no app store needed. Want to see it?"

3. "I'm not interested."

Reframe: they don't know what they're saying no to yet. Buy 30 more seconds.

"Completely respect that. Quick question before I let you go — is it that you don't need a website at all, or that you've been pitched this kind of thing too many times and they all sound the same? Because if it's the second one, I think we're actually different."

If they still say no after this, mark Lost with reason "not interested." Do not push.

4. "Send me an email."

Reframe: "send me an email" usually means "go away." Convert it into a real callback or take the no.

"Happy to. So I send something useful and not generic — what's the one thing about your current website (or lack of one) that bugs you the most? I'll tailor it to that and reply within the hour."

If they answer the question → send a tailored email (use the Email Follow-up template, customize the bullets).

If they dodge → "Got it, I'll keep it short. What's the best email?"

5. "How much does it cost?"

Reframe: price without scope is meaningless. Don't anchor before you know what they need.

"Honest answer: I don't know yet, because what we'd build for a [their industry] runs different from a typical website. We have a one-time build fee plus a small monthly that covers hosting, updates, and the app. The build fee depends on how custom we go. Is it OK if I ask three questions about what you'd want, and then I'll give you a number?"

6. "I don't have time right now."

Reframe: that's the truth — they're running a business. Respect it and bank a callback.

"Totally get it, you sound slammed. Real quick — is mornings or afternoons usually better for a 10-minute call later this week? I'll text you a reminder so you don't have to remember."

7. "I'm too small for this."

Reframe: small businesses are who this is built for. The big ones already have an in-house team.

"That's actually exactly why I called you. Big chains have full-time IT departments. Independent [their type] like yours don't, and that's where most of the money in our market goes — to platforms that get rich on top of you. We built this so the owner of a single shop has the same tools the chain across town has. Mind if I show you?"

8. "I tried this with someone else and it didn't work."

Reframe: learn from their bad experience and differentiate. Lots of agencies build sites and disappear.

"Sorry to hear that — happens way more than it should. Quick question: did they ghost you after launch, did the site get slow, or did the leads just not come in? I want to make sure we don't repeat whatever went wrong before I even pitch you anything."

9. "Email it to my partner / spouse / accountant."

Reframe: they're handing you off. The decision-maker isn't here.

"Of course — what's their email? And quick: are they the right person to make the call on something like this, or do they usually just relay it back to you?"

If the prospect is the actual buyer, this surfaces it. If not, you've identified the real decision-maker and can ask for an intro call.

10. "How did you get my number?"

Reframe: tell the truth, briefly. The truth is usually more comforting than they fear.

"Public listing — it's on your Google Business Profile and the directory at [yellowpages.com / whatever]. If you'd rather we don't reach out again, no problem at all, I'll take you off our list right now."

If they ask to be removed, do it. Mark DNC with reason "Asked to be removed" same call.

11. "What's NEPA-PRO?"

Reframe: credibility in two sentences. Don't recite the website.

"We're a veteran-owned construction and property maintenance company in Clarks Summit, PA. We started building software internally for our own crews — scheduling, customer-facing portals — and the tools turned out to be useful for other small businesses, so we spun up a sales arm. Everything we sell, we run ourselves first."

12. "Take me off your list / Don't call me again."

Action: stop. The script ends here.

"Of course. I've taken you off our list right now — you won't hear from us again. Have a great day."

Mandatory: mark Do Not Call in the dialer before ending the call. Do not pitch. Do not offer a discount. Do not "let me just send you one thing." Comply, exit, move on. This is non-negotiable and TCPA-binding (see Compliance doc).
